Water rights involving a small brook in Dummerston, near the Putney line, are the subject of a controversy between Irving Ketchum of Dummerston and the Vermont Brck company of Putney, Mr. Ketchum has secured an injunction against the company, restraining it from diverting the water, and the defendant brought a petition Monday for the dis-solution of the injunction, but no hearing on the petition has been held. Mr. Ketchum, through his counsel, R. C. Bacon, avers that he owns a farm near the highway leading from Putney village to the railroad station; that a never-falling brook flowed through the lands next adjoining his, thence through his pasture and farm in a well defined channel, in quantity sufficient to water all the stock that the farm would care for; that the brick plant is not on land contiguous to the brook, and that about April 1, 1912, the company wrongfully and without permission built a dam across the brook and ran a pipe across the highway to the plant for the use of a boiler and engine diverting all the water and depreciating the value of the land. Chancellor Frank L. Fish granted the prayer for an injunction. The defendant, through Attorney H. E. Eddy says in its answer that the brook does not flow in well defined channels; that it does not flow through land adjoining the farm of the orator; that the brick company owns the land from which the water is taken; that the amount of water diverted is not large; that a large stream flows through the orator's pas-ture, and that no damage has resulted to the orator. The defendant company says the injunction has compelled it to pump water from another stream at great expense and delay, and that there is danger that it will be unable to fill orders, wherefor it asks that the injunction be removed.
